Georgia shuts off all outdoor power

Overview

What's going on with power outages in Atlanta?

The majority of those outages were concentrated in Atlanta metro counties. Crews are working quickly to make restorations. Icy conditions and falling branches in some areas are making that more challenging. ATLANTA - Power crews worked hard to get service restored for their customers with chilly temperatures still lingering.

Did early morning storms cause power outages in Georgia?

Georgia Power customers may have received a pop-up notifying them that early morning storms caused power outages across the state. The power company says crews are actively working to respond to outages safely and as quickly as possible. Around 2 p.m., officials said power had been restored to nearly 170,000 customers.

Why did Georgia Power shut down?

In a post on X, formerly known as Twitter, Georgia Power acknowledged the challenges crews were facing due to icy conditions. "As our crews anticipated based on the forecast, additional freezing rain and falling trees have caused power outages as the sun has gone down. We understand how important power is, especially in this cold.

What happened to Georgia Power & Georgia EMC?

Crews from Georgia Power and Georgia EMCs were working to restore service to customers across North Georgia and the Atlanta metro area after a winter storm dropped snow and ice on Friday and into Saturday.
